Students test security of Pubhubs

On January 25th, the Radboud student hackteam visited the PubHubs office to do a so called 'penetration test'.

The students used all their skills to try and break into PubHubs. They tried, for example, to get access to a user's account, get access to their personal data or to impersonate someone. PubHubs stands for security, privacy and reliable information. It is important to test PubHubs on these values since our developers are human and errors can easily creep in.

The students indeed found some weaknesses in our system and PubHubs is now all the more secure and reliable because of it. We are grateful to them and, most importantly, it was a fun day of hacking!
